FORMATION OF THE STATE REGIONAL POLICY
IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF ANIMAL HUSBANDRY

Problem setting. Theoretical and practical bases of the state regional policy in development of animal husbandry, one of the main branches of agriculture are investigated. A lot of important role is played by the regions, as the main components of the regional level of government of the state, which is assigned part of the powers that are inherent in the central authorities. Actually, these topical issues prompted the search for innovative approaches to the formation of the state regional policy and the modernization of the system management of regional development of livestock.

Recent research and publications analysis. Theoretical and methodological research of aspects of formation and implementation of the state policy of regional development and creation of national conditions of public administration and regulation of social and economic processes of the country and its separate regions was studied in the works by domestic scientists. However, the characteristic transformational changes in economic and social processes that occur at the regional level, require more in-depth research on the formation of new views on the content and structural construction of a modern model of state regional policy in the development of animal husbandry.

Paper objective. The purpose of the article is to substantiate the theoretical foundations and conceptual approaches to the formation and formation of the state regional policy in the development of animal husbandry.

Paper main body. It is established that intensive development of animal husbandry is directed on full satisfaction of needs of the population of regions in products of an animal origin, on the basis of rational use of productive opportunities of genetic potential of animals and production resources. The scientific bases, principles, methods of formation and implementation of the state regional policy are covered. It is noted that legislative and executive institutions are actively involved in the development and implementation of state policy. The uneven distribution of livestock in the regions of natural and climatic zones of the country, which affects the production of livestock products. The article proves the need to use common principles and approaches to creating favorable conditions for the formation of the state regional policy, which provides not only the revival and stabilization of livestock development, but also the involvement of factors of expansion and growth of livestock production, improving the competitiveness of regions and effective public administration in the field of regional development.

Conclusions of the research. The above gives grounds to the conclusion that the state regional policy is the main component of the development and life of the regions, as it is aimed at improving the quality of life of their citizens and ensuring social stability.

Further study requires a comprehensive analysis of the socio-political aspect of the formation and application of the state regional policy in various areas and sectors of production, especially in animal husbandry, and the state of coordination of the central and local executive authorities for its implementation. Directions of improvement of the organization of structural filling and improvement of the basic provisions of the state regional policy which will promote effective activity of the livestock enterprises are offered.
